Administrative rulemaking is one of the most consequential – and complex – policymaking processes in Colorado. Whereas legislation often provides a broad outline for a particular policy, rulemaking is where the specific contours of that policy truly take shape. Robust collaboration and communication between rulemaking bodies and the individuals and communities most impacted by rules is essential.

The ideas and suggestions captured in this report present an opportunity for our state to assess the status quo of administrative rulemaking and consider changes that could make the process more equitable, to the benefit of all Coloradans.
