What might we do to demonstrate that we offer culturally relevant program infrastructure and services?

There are many ways applicants can express this alignment. For example, an applicant can express how they have current connections with the community they are working to serve, and have gathered insights into their design process, as well as ongoing feedback opportunities, to ensure input is incorporated. Staff often is representative of the community served, and has navigated participation barriers related to language, location, child care, transportation or any number of unique barriers or facilitators to participation. An applicant may also rely on evidence from their own work or examples from other communities with similar characteristics.

How do you classify low income?

As defined by the National Center for Children in Poverty, families and children are defined as low-income if the family income is less than twice the federal poverty threshold. Families experiencing low-income often face greater barriers to achieving health. The level of income that poses a barrier, in combination to access to other resources, varies by community and family. The percentage of children in a community eligible for child care subsidies, average family income or other indicators your organization may use to determine need may be considered.

Can funding support basic needs of family, friend and neighbor caregivers or the families they serve?

The Foundation is interested in building networks among family, friend and neighbor caregivers to support reduced isolation, improved well-being, improved access to resources and professional development related to healthy child development. Applicants can apply for support to overcome barriers to achieving those goals, which may include transportation, child care, food for gatherings, etc. It may also include educational materials for the home setting that related to activities aligned with professional development. Funding is not available for routine meals for children, diapers or other basic supplies for children in family, friend and neighbor care.

Can funding be used for mental health treatment for family, friend and neighbor caregivers?

Funding can be used to bring together groups of caregivers to offer support and reduce isolation. Professional development and coaching opportunities may attend to improved understanding of trauma and effects on children and caregivers, as well as stress and emotion management tools. Efforts may also go toward making better connections to available mental health supports in local communities. Funding for formal mental health treatment is not eligible.

What funding levels will be considered?

We anticipate a range of $50,000 to $150,000, but proposals outside of that range will be considered.

Will multiyear funding be considered?

Applicants can request funds for up to three years.
